Raul lists regulations, international prices and politics as the main challenges to success in mining for development in Peru. Through various IM4DC activities, Raul has developed his leadership skills, knowledge and networks, all of which are now contributing to his work in developing long-term relationship concepts related to stakeholder management and prioritising safety and health. Stakeholders who have contributed to his achievements include some government offices, university, Hochschild Mining and mining society.

Raul was involved in an IM4DC sponsored course on leadership in health and safety in Peru in 2015.

The course of leadership in health and safety was very good, in addition to the excellent speakers the students were very well chosen. I think from this activity, a network on health and safety has been established that must be kept alive and that's the challenge.

He hopes to continue to provide beneficial influence to affected communities and those working in the resources industry, by sharing new concepts, leading new projects and acting as a facilitator both at and outside work.

My future plans are to continue supporting the process of bringing order to the issues of safety and health at work in Peru, achieving consistent standards, providing opportunities for sharing experiences, improving leadership and the ability influence to better position health and safety issues.
